

Using good reading in your classroom

- Share students' reviews online or as part of a writing competition, then send the best to goodreading – we could include them in the magazine
- Use the magazine to help you choose books for whole class reading (there are around 15-20 suggestions for younger readers every month)
- Help students make their own reading choices
- Help students learn how to craft a review or article (writing persuasive texts, media)
- Keep yourself, your librarians, and your students up-to-date with new books
- Use the magazine to help students with visual literacy and an understanding of graphic design
- Ask your students to use our website or our facebook fan page as a forum for discussing books or posting reviews
- Download teaching notes, extracts or book club notes for hundreds of books from our website
- Enter one of our competitions to win books for all ages, or have your class enter as a group
- Explore the internet wisely – find links to fun, interactive book sites directly from our website
- Keep up-to-date with book news, award winners and book events
- Encourage students to create their own magazine and submit it to goodreading for inclusion on our website
- Encourage students to explore self-publishing (see the February 2009 issue)
- Good Reading Online can be accessed by all teachers and students simultaneously, making it a valuable online teaching resource.
